

Classical Schools in America: A Movement of Hope

Rachel Alexander Cambre, PhD

Responding to parental demand for more options and input regarding their children’s education, lawmakers have created or expanded education choice programs in more than a dozen states over the past few years, restoring education freedom for rising numbers of American parents. But parents are not simply seeking education freedom: They are, in increasing numbers, seeking an education for freedom for their children—a classical liberal arts education that aims to form adults capable of understanding, exercising, and protecting their American rights and responsibilities. This report constitutes an inquiry into that model of education by surveying the growing number of classical liberal arts schools committed to it.

In his 1943 book Education for Freedom, Robert Maynard Hutchins, then-president of the University of Chicago, warned against modern schooling’s unnatural extension of adolescence. “It has often been asserted on very high authority that the American educational system prolongs adolescence far beyond the point at which young people in other countries are turned out of education to assume adult responsibilities,” Hutchins wrote, lamenting the ways in which this slows maturation.<sup>1</sup> Echoing his concerns across the pond but a few years later, British novelist Dorothy Sayers noted the stark contrast provided by the “remarkably early age at which the young men went up to the University in, let us say, Tudor times” against the “artificial prolongation of intellectual childhood and adolescence into the years of physical maturity which is so marked in our own day.”<sup>2</sup>

In a day and age in which far fewer Americans are reaching the traditional markers of adulthood—work, marriage, and parenthood—Hutchins’s and Sayers’s complaints might sound quaint by comparison.<sup>3</sup> Add to that the tragic mental health epidemic engulfing today’s children and adolescents, with rates of anxiety, depression, and self-harm skyrocketing, and the fate of American adulthood looks grim, indeed.<sup>4</sup> Hutchins and Sayers, it turns out, were identifying the seed of a problem that is now full-grown. And that is that a society that fails to teach its youth the arts and virtues of self-government condemns them to perpetual childhood, thereby condemning itself to the “soft despotism” Alexis de Tocqueville feared democracy was vulnerable to. As Founding Father John Adams put it in a letter regarding the education of his own children, “If we suffer their minds to grovel and creep in infancy, they will grovel all their lives.”<sup>5</sup>

American parents are recognizing the gravity of this crisis, however, and their response has been impressive. For the past four years, droves of American parents have withheld or withdrawn their children from the public school system—and state legislatures have noticed.<sup>6</sup> Responding to parental demand for more options and input when it comes to their children’s education, lawmakers created and expanded education choice programs in over a dozen states in 2023 alone, a trend that has continued into 2024.<sup>7</sup> But parents are not simply seeking education freedom. They are, in increasing numbers, seeking an education for freedom for their children—a classical liberal arts education that aims to form adults capable of understanding, exercising, and protecting their American rights and responsibilities. This paper constitutes an inquiry into that model of education by surveying the growing number of classical liberal arts schools committed to it.

Methodology

There are now more than 1,000 such schools throughout the U.S., over 250 of which have opened since 2020.<sup>8</sup> Membership in two of the largest classical school associations—the Association of Classical Christian Schools (ACCS) and the Institute for Catholic Liberal Education (ICLE)—has doubled and tripled, respectively, over the past 10 years.<sup>9</sup> Nor does that growth appear to be slowing any time soon, according to a recent market analysis by the education consulting group Arcadia Education.<sup>10</sup> Citing several signs of increasing demand, not least of which are the waitlists reported by many classical schools, Arcadia predicted that the current pace of new classical school growth—which it estimated to be almost 5 percent per annum—will likely continue through the next decade.<sup>11</sup>

In light of the classical school movement's impressive growth—a remarkable demonstration of education freedom in action—this paper offers a survey of various schools that make up the movement today. What are the educational methods that unite these independent schools, and why are they appealing to increasing numbers of parents? In what ways do classical schools differ from one another, and do the differences between them undermine that unity? In order to capture the spirit of this movement without overlooking the diversity within it, this paper draws from the mission statements, educational philosophies, curriculum outlines, and co-curricular offerings of 882 classical schools, as well as the education reformers they cite as guides.<sup>12</sup>

This method differs from that of most existing analyses of the classical school movement, which tend to focus on a handful of influential institutions or associations, rather than assess a comprehensive set of schools.<sup>13</sup> To arrive at the 882 schools included in this study, research began with lists of schools in the U.S. affiliated with the nine largest classical school associations:

- The ACCS (accredited and full members);
- The ICLE;
- The Society for Classical Learning;
- The Classical Latin Schools Association;
- The Consortium for Classical Lutheran Education;
- Great Hearts Academies;
- The Chesterton Schools Network;
- The CiRCE Institute; and
- The Hillsdale College K–12 Office, which includes its Barney Charter School Initiative.<sup>14</sup>

Among the schools affiliated with these organizations are those that were not initially founded as classical schools, but either have adopted or intend to adopt a classical curriculum. To avoid including the latter—those exploring but not yet actively offering a classical education—the study excluded from its final selection those that make little to no mention of providing a classical liberal arts education on their websites, as well as those that plan to open their doors in 2025 or later.<sup>15</sup> The 882 schools that remain, on the other hand, all explicitly profess to provide a classical liberal arts education on their school websites and demonstrate that commitment through their mission and vision statements, educational philosophies, curriculum maps, and, where possible, e-mail and phone correspondence with school administrators.

Study of these materials—and the education reformers they reflect—reveals three ideas that seem to animate the work of classical schools and unite them into a cohesive movement. First, classical schools understand education to entail passing down the wisdom of past generations. Second, in part because this intellectual tradition is so rich and complex, classical schools seek to prepare students for a life of learning, whether that continues at the university level or not, by equipping them with the habits and skills necessary to learn for themselves. And lastly, classical schools understand this preparation to require formation of character as much as intellect, for the moral and intellectual virtues, though “two in speech,” to borrow a phrase from Aristotle, are “naturally inseparable.”<sup>16</sup> In short, classical schools equip students with the knowledge, wisdom, and virtue essential for appreciating, practicing, and preserving their American freedoms.

The Great Tradition

In his 1943 “Autobiography of an Uneducated Man,” Hutchins described his own school days as “a business of passing examinations and meeting requirements,” a business he succeeded in well enough to go on to study at Oberlin and Yale.<sup>17</sup> Yet despite the prestige of his alma maters, Hutchins arrived at the end of his undergraduate education with “no understanding of science, mathematics, or philosophy,” nor much knowledge of literature.<sup>18</sup> “What is perhaps more important,” Hutchins wrote, “I had no idea what I was doing or why.”<sup>19</sup> When, in law school, he stumbled upon the liberal arts of grammar, logic, and rhetoric, as well as the great works of philosophy, history, literature, and law that have built Western civilization, he realized that the fragmented and test-driven schooling he had endured until then had been no education at all, a lesson that informed his later efforts to reform the undergraduate education at the University of Chicago.<sup>20</sup> “To be free,” Hutchins concluded, “a man must understand the tradition in which he lives.”<sup>21</sup>

Hutchins is not a name typically invoked in synopses of the modern classical school movement in America—a movement that did not begin in earnest until the 1980s—but at least a dozen schools cite his influence, and with good reason: Many classical schools’ founding stories echo Hutchins’s autobiography.<sup>22</sup> A parent or group of parents catches a glimpse of the rich intellectual tradition that has shaped human history, and they feel awed—and robbed. To avoid depriving their own children of this intellectual inheritance, they start a school. And they ground its curriculum in the liberal arts and great books that have stood the test of time.

Liberal Arts. Hence, over 85 percent of the classical schools in this study teach some or all of the ancient and medieval liberal arts of grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music.<sup>23</sup> The first three—grammar, logic, and rhetoric, or the trivium—entail the study of language. Students learn not only the parts of language (including those of the classical languages of Latin and/or Greek), but also the principles of formal logic and rhetoric so that they may learn to reason, speak, and write well.<sup>24</sup> This study of order and beauty in language in turn prepares them for the study of order and beauty in number through the arts of arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music: the quadrivium.<sup>25</sup> Education in these arts dates back to the time of Plato and Aristotle, but also formed the basis of the American grammar schools of the Founding era, which American historian Andrew H. Browning defines as “school[s] that taught Latin grammar through classical literature,” in addition to teaching arts like logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, and geometry.<sup>26</sup>

Great Books. Classical schools—at least 80 percent of the schools in this study—revive this education in the liberal arts in large part through encounters with the “masterpieces of the liberal arts,” as 20th-century American philosopher Scott Buchanan, founder of the great books program at St. John’s College in Annapolis, Maryland, described the classics, or the great books.<sup>27</sup> In this, too, they resurrect not just a Western intellectual tradition, but a distinctly American one, reading the same classics that inspired many of the Founders.<sup>28</sup> Classical schools teach these texts—ranging from Homer’s Odyssey, Euclid’s Elements, and Shakespeare’s plays to the Declaration of Independence—not simply because they have impacted the course of history, and therefore our own time, but because they transcend time. Indeed, the principles of geometry, as well as those of human nature investigated by Homer and Shakespeare, remain as true today as they did thousands of years ago. An education steeped in this intellectual tradition thus prepares students for the timeless pursuit of the transcendentals—truth, goodness, and beauty.

Religious Tradition. Classical schools manifest their commitment to transmitting the “wisdom of the ages” in other ways as well.<sup>29</sup> While all teach the classical liberal arts, about 80 percent of the schools in this study also teach the religious intellectual traditions that have formed the West, and do so in ways that go beyond simply opening and closing the day with prayer.<sup>30</sup> Christian classical schools, for instance, teach the Christian intellectual tradition, beginning with the text of the Bible, but also including writings of early Church Fathers like Ignatius of Antioch and Augustine of Hippo.<sup>31</sup> Catholic liberal arts schools further incorporate the texts that pertain to the Catholic intellectual tradition, teaching Catholic novelists, doctors of the Church, and the papal encyclicals that constitute Catholic social teaching.<sup>32</sup> And as the first Jewish classical school prepares to open its doors this fall, it offers a model for what a distinctly Jewish classical education might look like, with plans to teach Hebrew, the Tanakh, and the texts of modern Zionism.<sup>33</sup>

Local Tradition. Far from uniform, classical schools differ by commitment to particular religious denominations—or to religious neutrality—as well as by commitment to particular local traditions. Bonner Classical Academy, for example, a new classical school in northern Idaho, offers a robust program in the mechanical arts—from woodworking to circuitry—an homage to the living tradition of homesteading so prevalent in that region.<sup>34</sup> Similarly, Covenant Academy, a classical school northwest of Houston, partners with a nearby long-standing 10-acre farm, both to give students hands-on experience with agricultural projects and to “provide students with a connection to the experiences of local people in history,” the academy’s website reads.<sup>35</sup> While these variations in curriculum distinguish classical schools from one another, they flow from a conviction the schools share: that education concerns passing down the intellectual and cultural traditions that undergird American communities today.

Parents as Educators. The pride of place that classical schools give to the family also flows from this conviction. Consistent with their parent-driven origins, classical schools tend to recognize parents as the primary educators of their children and therefore partners—rather than subordinates—to the school, with almost 70 percent of the schools in this study including explicit statements to that effect on their websites.<sup>36</sup> Nor are these statements all talk. Some schools encourage parental involvement by permitting parents to pay for a portion of tuition through hours volunteered at the school, while others invite parents to study the texts their children are reading by providing classical education programs for them or hosting parent reading groups.<sup>37</sup> And a growing number of classical schools—about 30 percent, currently—further embrace their partnerships with parents by implementing hybrid learning models, which combine in-class and at-home instruction.<sup>38</sup> By both bringing the liberal arts into the home and leaving space in the school week for the education family life provides—whether through grandparents’ old stories or parents’ homemaking arts—classical schools make the Western tradition a family tradition.

The Art of Learning

The Western intellectual tradition in which classical schools anchor their curricula is vast, spanning thousands of years and almost every continent, and encompassing works of philosophy, history, mathematics, science, theology, poetry, economics, and law—not to mention music, architecture, and fine art. The questions these works raise, moreover, demand a lifetime of study, as do the arts they give expression to. For these reasons, classical schools presume not to complete a student’s education, but to prepare him to complete it for himself. Indeed, most schools’ mission and vision statements explicitly promise to equip students with the tools they need to become “lifelong learners,” prioritizing this end over the aims of college- or career-readiness.

In this, they echo the reformers that helped to inspire the classical school movement, who understood the pursuit of wisdom and knowledge through the classical liberal arts to take a lifetime. “Schooling is the preparatory phase,” Mortimer Adler, Hutchins’s friend, co-editor, and fellow professor at the University of Chicago, wrote in The Paideia Proposal, a text occasionally cited on classical school websites. “[I]t forms the habit of learning and provides the means for continuing to learn after all schooling is completed.”<sup>39</sup> For “there is not one period of life, our school days, in which we sit down to regular meals of intellectual diet, but we must eat every day in order to live,” British educational reformer Charlotte Mason, another 20th-century influence on classical schools, explained in An Essay Towards a Philosophy of Education.<sup>40</sup> Hence, as Sayers, whose famous 1947 essay, “The Lost Tools of Learning,” remains a leading source of inspiration for classical schools, concluded, “For the sole true end of education is simply this: to teach men how to learn for themselves; and whatever instruction fails to do this is effort spent in vain.”<sup>41</sup>

Attention and Memory. The “tools of learning” classical schools equip students with are not those typically found in modern classrooms—textbooks, projectors, or the ever-prevalent personal tablets. Rather, the tools classical schools focus on honing are the mental powers inherent to human nature that, like their physical counterparts, will enervate if usurped by external aids. Foremost among these capacities are those of attention and memory.<sup>42</sup> Out of concern for the former, some classical schools cultivate a deliberately low-tech environment, reducing exposure to artificial stimulation in order to safeguard what Mason called children’s natural “power of concentration.”<sup>43</sup> For similar reasons, classical schools heed Mason’s warnings against the use of textbooks, preferring primary sources, since, in replacing firsthand accounts of history, science, and art with outlines and summaries, textbooks deprive students of the need to attend to the details themselves.<sup>44</sup>

In addition to exercising students’ powers of attention through the reading of good books, teachers in turn prompt their exercise of memory by having them recall orally what they have read, either through Mason’s method of narration, in which students describe what they have read, or, more commonly, through recitation, which Sayers recommends.<sup>45</sup> Indeed, almost 60 percent of the classical schools in this study incorporate memory work into their curricula.<sup>46</sup> By teaching students to know by heart, or memorize, the important facts of history, geography, and literature they come across in books, classical schools not only strengthen students’ powers of attention and memory, but they also arm them with yet another piece of “intellectual equipment,” what American education reformer E. D. Hirsch dubbed “cultural literacy.”<sup>47</sup> “Reading and writing are cumulative skills,” Hirsch, whom classical schools also cite as a resource, explained in his 1987 book Cultural Literacy; “the more we read[,] the more necessary knowledge we gain for further reading.”<sup>48</sup>

Reason. However vital the “core knowledge” Hirsch and Mason highlight may be, classical schools understand that facts are useless without a corresponding capacity to reason about them.<sup>49</sup> Hence, just as they teach phonics, handwriting, and arithmetic so that students may learn how to read, write, add, and subtract, classical schools also teach classes on formal logic so that students may learn how to reason. While over 85 percent of the classical schools in this study express commitment to teaching the trivium, 65 percent further specify the dedication of particular courses to the formal teaching of logic, rather than solely approaching logic as a stage in the process of learning other subjects.<sup>50</sup> Good Shepherd School, for example, a Catholic classical school in Purcellville, Virginia, describes its classes in formal logic as studies in the “art of the syllogism,” in which students learn “to draw valid conclusions from premises, to identify the premise of an argument, and to carefully find the point of disagreement should we differ from the conclusion.”<sup>51</sup> Just as students are expected to use their reading, writing, and arithmetic skills in the course of their other studies, so, too, are they expected to apply the principles of logic in all of their studies, whether translating Latin, interpreting a work of literature, evaluating an event of history, or proving a mathematical theorem.

It is these principles of logic, in fact, that anchor Socratic seminars at classical schools, in which “teachers guide and coach students in respectful debate, clear and logical argument, persuasive rhetoric, and careful questioning,” as St. Jerome Institute (SJI), a Catholic classical high school in Washington, DC, describes its seminars in humanities, art history, natural philosophy, and mathematics.<sup>52</sup> Inspired by the dialogues between Socrates and his interlocutors recorded in Plato’s writings, Socratic seminars typically focus on a central text (or work of art or mathematical concept, depending on the subject matter) that students then probe through discussion.<sup>53</sup> With the teacher’s guidance, students not only come to better understand the text or question at hand, but they also learn how to have an enriching conversation—how to identify clarifying questions, how to articulate ideas eloquently, and how to engage one another’s ideas, in turn, as Trinity Academy, a Christian classical school in Portland, Oregon, puts it.<sup>54</sup>

By instructing students in the art of conversation, classical schools equip them with yet another tool for lifelong learning, teaching them how to learn with and from one another, both face-to-face and text-to-text. For through seminar discussions of seminal texts, students encounter fruitful disagreements not just between themselves, but between the great thinkers of the Western intellectual tradition, who often disagreed with one another pointedly, offering competing arguments for what it means to live well. Nevertheless, in doing so, great texts demonstrate a shared concern for truth, goodness, and beauty, as well as a shared faith in human beings’ capacity to reason together about the world around them. Indeed, among the many names this intellectual tradition goes by—the “great books,” the “history of ideas,” the “best which has been thought and said”—the one most fittingly used by classical schools is that of Hutchins and Adler, who called it “the great conversation.”<sup>55</sup>

Character Formation

As an intellectual endeavor, conversation demands the exercise of intellectual skills—the capacities for attention, memory, reasoning, and rhetoric that classical schools seek to cultivate through their teaching methods. But it also demands the exercise of moral virtue. Listening to another’s comments, for example, requires the humility to recognize that one does not know everything, as well as the moderation of one’s desires to speak instead. Sharing one's own thoughts or questions, on the other hand, might require courage, should they contradict or raise doubts about the opinions of one's peers. Recognizing a close connection between the virtue of one's character and the success of one's pursuit of knowledge and wisdom, then, classical schools seek to form students' hearts and souls as much as they form their minds.

Decorum. For most schools, this formation takes place through the curriculum itself, as students discover examples of virtue (and vice) in the books they read, from C. S. Lewis's The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe to Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. But many supplement this formation by upholding high standards of decorum. Nearly all classical schools, for instance, require uniforms, with many explaining on their websites that they do so in order to instill a sense of dignity, modesty, and propriety among students.<sup>56</sup>

Some classical schools go further in this regard, explicitly teaching standards of etiquette, both within the core curriculum and as stand-alone courses.<sup>57</sup> At Pacifica Christian High School in Newport Beach, California, for example, seminars include instruction in "basic table manners, including the importance of looking people in the eye, addressing people by name, employing attentive body language, and listening completely before responding to a person's comments."<sup>58</sup> But at Westminster Academy, a K-12 classical school in Memphis, Tennessee, "protocol" is taught as its own course, in which students learn skills ranging from how to make an introduction to how to make a toast.<sup>59</sup> Far from breeding snobs, classes like these teach students to consider others before themselves, observing principles of etiquette not as a matter of virtue-signaling, but as a matter of serving their fellow man.<sup>60</sup>

Common Arts. For the same reason, some classical schools have also begun supplementing their liberal arts curricula with instruction in the common arts, which encompass the practical skills that meet basic human needs, such as gardening, navigation, plumbing, cooking, and sewing.<sup>61</sup> At The Stonehaven School in Marietta, Georgia, for example, upper-level students take responsibility for "hands-on stewardship of the land," from composting to canning harvested produce.<sup>62</sup> A mandatory sequence in industrial arts at Thales Academy, on the other hand, teaches students how to woodwork and fix machinery, while St. Jerome Institute's "practicum" teaches basic engine maintenance.<sup>63</sup> Education in these arts cultivates virtues of industry, thrift, and self-reliance in students, but, as with etiquette education, it also ultimately enables them "to be of greater service to others," as SJI puts it, whether at home, on campus, or in the greater community.<sup>64</sup>

Community. House systems further facilitate this character formation by “challeng[ing] students to hold one another accountable in the pursuit of a virtuous life,” as Saint Agnes School, a K–12 Catholic classical school in St. Paul, Minnesota, describes.<sup>65</sup> Inspired by a British boarding school tradition, house systems sort all students into “houses,” or communities that encompass members from all upper grade levels, so as to foster friendship and mentorship across differences in age, ability, and interests. At the roughly 240 classical schools that have them, student-led houses meet and compete throughout the year in categories ranging from academics and athletics to hospitality, common arts projects, and community service.<sup>66</sup> As a result, students learn that they are their “brother’s keeper,” responsible not only for their own pursuit of virtue, but for one another’s as well.

A Reason for Hope

In 2019, University of Notre Dame sociologists conducted a study of 24- to 42-year-old alumni from a range of K–12 educational institutions—public schools, secular private schools, religious private schools, homeschools, and classical Christian schools—comparing traits such as college- and-career readiness, independence of thought, and involvement in local communities.<sup>67</sup> In order to isolate the effects of schooling from factors like family income, religion, frequency of family church attendance, and parents’ marital status, researchers calibrated the data through a regression analysis.<sup>68</sup> Even so, the classical graduates stood out, and not just in their achievements. Classical school alumni professed healthier outlooks on life than their non-classical counterparts, indicating remarkably greater gratitude for their lives, direction and resilience in their sufferings, trust in their fellow citizens, and confidence in dealing with life’s problems.<sup>69</sup>

The grit and hope that classical school alumni harbor reflects the liberal character of the education they have received. By inviting students to join mankind’s greatest thinkers in pondering life’s deepest questions, a classical liberal arts education broadens students’ horizons beyond the opinions and anxieties that dominate their own place and time. And by equipping them with the virtues necessary to learn for themselves, it prepares them to continue their education, bearing fruit not just for themselves, but for their neighbors as well.

These virtues are as emblematic of America’s intellectual tradition as they are essential for her future. America’s Founding rests, after all, on the hope that human beings are capable of self-rule—of rising above their passions and infirmities and living well. As historian Wilfred McClay puts it, “nothing about America better defines its distinctive character than the ubiquity of hope, a sense that the way things are initially given to us cannot be the final word about them, that we can never settle for that.”<sup>70</sup> Classical schools not only understand this character, but impart it to their students. And in doing so, they give this land hope.

List of Classical Schools (Page 1 of 37)

The table on the following pages displays data from the websites of the 882 classical schools that informed this paper. In addition to identifying the name, state, opening year, operational model, grades offered, and student population of each school, the table also highlights distinctive attributes of each school's mission and curriculum offerings.

Notes about the Categories:

Opening year: Many classical schools are schools with established histories that have only recently adopted a classical curriculum. Hence, to more accurately represent the classical school movement's pace of growth, the "Opening Year" column includes both the year each school first opened its doors, and, where applicable, the year that it adopted a classical curriculum, with the two years separated by a slash. Where those two years are the same, only one year is listed. For schools that transitioned to the classical model after opening but did not provide the year of transition on their websites or in response to emails, however, a slash follows the opening year.

Student population: Not all schools publish their student body numbers on their websites. For those that do not and did not respond to email inquiries, this column has been left blank.

Schedule: While schools that operate with a traditional 5-days-a-week schedule are indicated by "5-day," schools that operate with a shortened 4-days-a-week or half-day schedule are indicated by "4-day" or "half-day," respectively. Schools that operate with a further shortened, part-time, or hybrid schedule, meeting on campus for fewer than four full days a week, are indicated by "hybrid." One asterisk indicates that a school offers a part-time or hybrid schedule as an option, while two asterisks indicates that the identified schedule pertains to some but not all grade levels.

Parental role: "Yes" indicates that a school includes on its website one or more statements either identifying its mission as a partnership with parents or affirming parents as the primary educators of their children. One plus-sign indicates that the school further encourages parental involvement by asking parents to volunteer a certain number of hours per semester or year, while two plus-signs indicate that the school invites parents to join in the classical education their children are receiving through parent classical education programs or reading groups.

Liberal arts: A "T" indicates that a school conveys a commitment to educating students in arts of the trivium—grammar, logic, and rhetoric—the traditional liberal arts of language, while a "Q" indicates that it conveys a commitment to educating students in arts of the quadrivium—arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music—the traditional liberal arts of number.

While most all American schools teach arithmetic, geometry, and music, a "Q" indicates that a school approaches these subjects as arts of the classical quadrivium, teaching Euclid's Elements in geometry, for example, or music theory in music. A hashtag following the "T" indicates that the school specifies its dedication of particular courses to the formal teaching of logic and/or rhetoric, rather than solely approaching logic and rhetoric as stages in the process of learning other subjects.

Classical languages: An "L," "G," "H," or "A" indicates that a school teaches Latin, Greek, Hebrew, or Arabic, respectively.

Great books: "Yes" indicates that a school teaches "the classics," whether identified as the great books, primary texts, or original sources.

Low-tech: "Yes" indicates that a school conveys on its website a commitment to limiting the use of screens in the classroom.

Memory work: "Yes" indicates that a school incorporates memory work into its curriculum, whether through recitation or narration.

Socratic method: "Yes" indicates that a school offers Socratic seminars or otherwise incorporates the Socratic method in the classroom.

Etiquette: "Yes" indicates that a school teaches proper etiquette, whether identified as manners, etiquette, or protocol, either during the school day or through co-curricular events.

House system: "Yes" indicates that a school implements a house system.

Common arts: "Yes" indicates that a school offers education in the common arts, such as gardening or shop class, either through dedicated courses or school-wide "common arts" days.

Website: An "X" preceding the website indicates that email and phone correspondence with school administrators clarified and supplemented the information available on the school's website.

8. This study includes about 900 classical schools in the U.S., drawn from lists of affiliated schools published by classical school associations (cf. note 14). Hence, because it excludes, for the most part, classical schools that remain unaffiliated with those associations, it is not an exhaustive list. A recent estimate made by Arcadia Education puts the count of classical schools in the U.S. at 1,551. Arcadia Education, "Market Analysis of U.S. Classical Education in Grades PK-12," February 22, 2024, <https://arcadiaed.com/2024/02/market-analysis-of-u-s-classical-education-in-grades-pk-12/> (accessed May 1, 2024). Both this study and Arcadia's identify over 250 classical schools that have opened since 2020.
9. The ACCS reported 234 affiliated schools in 2013 and 502 in 2023. Association of Classical Christian Schools, "The Mission of the ACCS," <https://classicalchristian.org/the-mission-of-the-accs/> (accessed May 1, 2024). Elisabeth Sullivan, the executive director of the ICLE, told Aleteia that while 73 schools were associated with the ICLE in 2013, there are now 237 ICLE-affiliated schools. Tom Hoopes, "Growth in Classical Education a Sign of Hope, Say Teachers," Aleteia, March 18, 2024, <https://aleteia.org/2024/03/18/growth-in-classical-education-a-sign-of-great-hope-say-teachers/> (accessed May 1, 2024).
10. Arcadia Education, "Market Analysis of U.S. Classical Education in Grades PK-12."
11. Arcadia Education's estimate "reflects school growth rates from the three largest umbrella organizations for Christian classical schools, the Association of Classical Christian Schools, the Institute for Catholic Liberal Education, and the Society for Classical Learning," and its "projection of classical schools and enrollment in 2035" estimates that "a total of 1.4 million students, or 2.4% of all students in K-12 education, could be enrolled in quality classical schools by 2035." Ibid.
12. The hundreds of classical schools in this study cite dozens of contemporary education reformers as influences. In the spirit of the classical school movement, however, which champions a return "to the sources," this paper largely draws from the earliest proponents of a modern return to classical liberal arts education whom schools cite, including Charlotte Mason, Dorothy Sayers, Robert Hutchins, and Mortimer Adler.
13. Two essays in National Affairs, for example, give helpful insight into the history of the classical school movement by highlighting the foundational roles that Cair Paravel Latin School in Topeka, Kansas, the Trinity School at Greenlawn in South Bend, Indiana, the Logos School in Moscow, Idaho, and the Trivium School in Lancaster, Massachusetts—all influenced by Dorothy Sayers's paper, "The Lost Tools of Learning"—and the associations that followed have played in the development of the movement. Ian Lindquist, "Classical Schools in Modern America," National Affairs, Fall 2019, <https://www.nationalaffairs.com/publications/detail/classical-schools-in-modern-america/> (accessed May 1, 2024), and Micah Meadowcraft, "Classical Education's Aristocracy of Anyone," National Affairs, Fall 2023, <https://www.nationalaffairs.com/publications/detail/classical-educations-aristocracy-of-anyone> (accessed May 1, 2024). Similarly, The New Yorker's and Tablet magazine's 2024 profiles of the movement focus on its current leadership, including that of the ACCS, the CiRCE Institute, the Classical Academic Press, the Classic Learning Test, and the growing charter school networks Great Hearts and Brilla. Emma Green, "Have the Liberal Arts Gone Conservative?" The New Yorker, March 11, 2024, <https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2024/03/18/have-the-liberal-arts-gone-conservative> (accessed May 1, 2024), and Maggie Phillips, "The Debates Over—and Within—Classical Education," Tablet, January 24, 2024, <https://www.tabletmag.com/sections/community/articles/classical-education-debate> (accessed May 1, 2024).

14. These lists can be found as follows: Association of Classical Christian Schools, “Find Classical Christian Schools in Your Area,” <https://classicalchristian.org/find-a-school/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Institute for Catholic Liberal Education, “View Schools by State,” <https://my.catholicliberaleducation.org/map-of-schools/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Society for Classical Learning, “Find Christian Schools Near You,” <https://www.societyforclassicallearning.org/find-christian-schools-near-you/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Classical Latin School Association, “Partner Schools,” <https://classicallatin.org/partner-schools/> (accessed May 1, 2024); “Standard Schools,” <https://classicallatin.org/standard-schools/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Consortium for Classical Lutheran Education, “Directory,” <https://www.ccle.org/directory/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Great Hearts America, “Great Hearts Academies United States Map,” <https://www.greatheartsamerica.org/academies/> (accessed May 1, 2024); Chesterton Schools Network, “Find a School,” <https://chestertonschoolsnetwork.org/find-a-school/> (accessed July 1, 2024); CIRCE Institute, “School Database,” <https://circeinstitute.org/school-database/> (accessed May 1, 2024); and Hillsdale College, “Hillsdale Classical Schools Across the Nation,” <https://k12.hillsdale.edu/Schools/Affiliate-Classical-Schools/> (accessed May 1, 2024).
15. This study also excluded the international schools affiliated with the above associations.
16. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Robert C. Bartlett and Susan D. Collins, trans. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2011), p. 23.
17. Hutchins, Education for Freedom, p. 2.
18. Ibid., p. 4.
19. Ibid.
20. Ibid., pp. 7–14 and 65–79.
21. Ibid., p. 14.
22. While 12 of the 882 schools in this study cite Hutchins on their websites, 30 cite his friend and co-editor Mortimer Adler, who experienced a similar life-changing encounter with the liberal arts and great books.
23. See appendix. Out of the 882 schools in this study, 773, or 88 percent, offer instruction in the trivium and/or the quadrivium, and 784, or 89 percent, teach Latin and/or Greek as part of their core curriculum, according to website materials and e-mail correspondence with school administrators.
24. Holy Family Classical School in Tulsa, Oklahoma, provides helpful definitions of the seven liberal arts on its website: Holy Family Classical School, “Classical Curriculum, Grades 1–12,” <https://www.holyfamilyclassicalschool.org/classical-curriculum-grades-1-8> (accessed May 1, 2024).
25. For further explanation of the quadrivium, see Jake Tawney, “Mathematics Is the Discipline That Bridges Heaven and Earth,” Benedictine College, April 24, 2024, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=f2gWpZvTCEA> (accessed May 1, 2024).
26. In Plato’s Meno, for example, he depicts Socrates teaching the art of geometry to Meno’s servant, and Aristotle’s Organon—his six works on logic—and Rhetoric offer instruction in the arts of logic and rhetoric no doubt taught at his Lyceum. Plato, Meno, George Anastaplo and Laurence Berns, trans. (Newburyport, MA: Focus Publishing, 2004), pp. 18–24; Aristotle, “Organon” and “Rhetorica” in Richard McKeon, ed., The Basic Works of Aristotle (New York: The Modern Library, 2001), pp. 1–212 and 1317–1452. Browning’s insightful book on the educational backgrounds of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 illustrates the prevalence of classical education at the time of the Founding, with most schools and tutors teaching the classical languages and liberal arts of logic, rhetoric, and geometry, notwithstanding divergent offerings in moral philosophy and political science. Andrew H. Browning, Schools for Statesmen: The Divergent Educations of the Constitution’s Framers (Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2022), pp. 4, 186, 200, and 276.
27. Of the 882 schools in this study, 708, or 80 percent, teach the great books—sometimes referred to as “classical literature,” the “Western canon,” “primary texts,” or “original sources”—according to website materials and e-mail correspondence with school administrators. See appendix. 28. As Browning details, Framers like Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, James Madison, and Alexander Hamilton were well-versed in the Greek and Roman classics of Aristotle, Plutarch, and Cicero, not to mention early modern “classics” of Grotius, Pufendorf, and Locke. Browning, Schools for Statesmen, pp. 38, 44–45, 57–59, and 63–64. In this, they were representative of other Framers, as well as Founders not present at the Constitutional Convention, like Thomas Jefferson, who enjoyed reading Tacitus, Thucydides, Newton, and Euclid in his leisure. “Thomas Jefferson to John Adams, January 21, 1812,” in The Letters of John and Abigail Adams, pp. 113–115.

32. The Lyceum, a Catholic classical school in South Euclid, Ohio, offers a good example of this incorporation. “Although the Bible, The Catechism of the Catholic Church, and the Summa Theologica form the backbone of The Lyceum Theology curriculum,” its website reads, “students will read supplemental texts from various fathers and doctors of the Church, but especially those of St [sic] Augustine and Saint John Henry Cardinal Newman.” The Lyceum, “Theology,” <https://www.thelyceum.org/curriculum-theology.html> (accessed May 3, 2024).

36. See appendix. Out of the 882 schools in this study, 585, or 66 percent, indicate support for parents as partners to the school and/or the primary educators of their children, either through statements to that effect, by offering classical education opportunities for parents, or by requiring parental volunteering.
37. At Ann Arbor Orthodox Classical Academy in Michigan, for example, parents may invest 20 hours per trimester volunteering for the school in lieu of $1,000 per trimester in tuition dollars. 55. The great books movement, which both Hutchins and Adler were instrumental in leading in America, can be traced to the work of the 19th-century English poet and literary critic Matthew Arnold, who gave the great books their well-known definition of “the best which has been thought and said in the world.” Matthew Arnold, Culture and Anarchy: An Essay in Political and Social Criticism (London: Smith, Elder & Co., 1869), p. viii, <https://www.gutenberg.org/cache/epub/4212/pg4212-images.html> (accessed April 29, 2024).
